

The Bank of Ireland Regional Pulses bring together the views of households and firms around the country. The results for August 2019 (3 month moving average basis) show that sentiment was down on the month across the board.

With Boris Johnson taking the reins as UK Prime Minister and fears of a no deal Brexit at the end of October rising, households in all regions took a gloomier view of the economic outlook this month (and also pared back their expectations for future house price gains), while firms in all regions were more downbeat about near-term prospects for business activity.
