

The Consumer Pulse came in at 84.0 in February 2020, up 1.3 on last month's reading and 2.9 higher than a year ago. Households – who appear to have put their concerns about Brexit on the back burner for the moment – were more upbeat about the economy's prospects this month, with the balance of positive and negative responses moving into the black for the first time since last June. And while they were a tad gloomier about their own finances, the buying climate remained resilient.

Bank of Ireland

economic pulse