

The Bank of Ireland Regional Pulses bring together the views of households and firms around the country. The indices are calculated on a 3 month moving average basis and show that sentiment was down across the board in the May to July period compared with the April to June period.

With the mood music remaining unsettled, firms in all regions were more downbeat about business activity this month, while households in all regions were gloomier about the economy and their personal finances. The latter also pared back their expectations for house price increases over the coming year.
